Artist Statement

When I lived in Hong Kong, I mostly made figurative and portraiture pieces. During the protests and throughout the restrictions imposed on us due to Covid, I felt the need to do spontaneous works to release emotion. I needed something that was fast and furious in its execution to help me overcome the frustrations of lockdown.

Painting continuously without pressure of subject matter forced a refocus on composition, colours and brushstrokes. The use of colour speaks to me in an emotional and psychological way. It is important for me to apply colour instinctually. Some of the pigment of vibrant rust coloured dirt and charcoal are from my hometown where I visited recently with my family. They speak volumes about how these works are so personal. Spontaneous, intuitive painting is for me a process of release. It is such a freeing experience – the complete opposite to what I was feeling in Hong Kong.

Some paintings aim to be realistic, while abstract paintings take the viewer on a different journey through triggering a felt experience. My experience of these abstract works on paper have made me reflect on my recent move from Hong Kong to Australia. Moving back home after nine wonderful years in Hong Kong has been difficult – a process of grieving.

I have realized that these deep feelings of loss aren't a bad thing, and that grief is one of life's emotions that we all experience in our own way. I returned to Australia to my sick brother who has since passed, and this accumulation of grief has only added to the need to heal through my exploration. Painting is a way of losing myself and allowing myself to feel deeply and then to forget - just for a brief moment. It has been a cathartic, comforting experience painting these artworks and I have gained an overriding sense of joy from the process.
